Chapter 1 by hesione

"No, no, I didn't," she said, and left the man to die unseen in the alley. It was easier, this way.

Chapter 2 by Strawberrychan17

Pulling her coat tighter around her thin frame, Anza walked faster. She didn't want to risk being seen by any unwanted spectators.

Murdering her mentally insane and evil twin for the benefit of society was one thing- but having to describe all the surrounding situations to it was an entirely different spectrum that she wasn't quite willing to embrace just yet.

Catching the last evening bus that would take her to her far away from here, Anza did her best to put the events of the past behind her while she watched the sun rise in its many scarlet and yellow hues.

Chapter 4 by Alexandra

As she stared out the bus window into the late night, moments that could have stopped the killing raced through her mind.

"Did you leave the toilet seat up?"

A sentence that should not have been provocative, but her brother said it with such force that it seemed to shatter the very room. Little did she know that that outburst would turn into a never-ending spiral of madness for the rest of his life.

At first, she tried to help him. His sudden outbursts shook her to the very core. She was nothing but a scared child back then, or at least, that's what she chose to be.

What made her brother so furious, so blood-thirsty, so utterly uncontrollable, was a mystery for so long, but she knew from the beginning that she would have to put a stop to it.

One night, when he was too much to handle, she went for a walk in the chilly streets of the crowded city. That's when her life changed. That's when They came out of the shadows to tell her about the virus.
